I would give the app a rating of 9 out of 10 because of the exceptional versatility and practicality of all its features. It is one of the most innovative apps of the year, which is surprising considering that it is the first application designed for the iOS ecosystem. This new iPad application has more features than the previous version of Photoshop Mobile, and helps me stop feeling overwhelmed and straining my eyes. Admittedly, this was a little less than intuitive for someone like me who's used to working on a laptop, because certain actions, like dropping a color or layer on top of itself, aren't easy to do without learning a new app. Over the past 4 weeks, I have been using the Aperture 3 iPad app daily for both editing and reviewing. The editing workflow is significant and streamlined, and sharing a library or on-screen notes from within Aperture has been essential. Adobe loves to throw features at you that are so complex that it takes years to learn them. These apps get pretty cool right off the bat, and make it pretty clear that this is not a simple web-designed app. The UI is slick, and Adobe has done a great job making it convenient to work through the interface and figure out your way around. I previously objected to the fact that the iPad lacked the Adobe's Creative Cloud app because I didn't want to pay for it. However, I've come to realize that the price is worth it for the power and efficiency of the app. I was upturned due to the fact that I couldn't find the option to "buy it." While the app is fairly complex, it is incredibly easy to use and offers consistently high performance. I have two computers running heavy Photoshop CS days, but I still have to logically choose to work on them in certain ways. That's not possible with iWork on my iPad, and Photoshop cannot work well trying to keep up with them.
