In February, both women were hired as research assistants, and one of them was told she had an "obligation" to visit the professor's office at the end of the semester. She said the offer came after she had complained about the professor's behaviour towards her. In its decision, the court said no coercive measures should be considered as remedies for the women's allegations of harassment. "I think it's the right decision," one of the women said. "It's time for a university to stand up and say 'no more of this.' It's time to do the right thing." U of O professor who raped student forced out of union: report 1:50 The court also found that the university misled the two women about its investigation into the allegations, and that it let the professor continue to teach for several months without resolving the allegations. "I don't think the university did anything wrong," the professor's lawyer said. "They were decent people doing decent things." The two women, who cannot be identified because they are minors, have been awarded $3,000 each as a result of the ruling, but they will have to pay the university $5,000 and $10,000 as a result of the expenses incurred by the university
