My catalog is now 5 months old and still hovering around 1.5GB. My memory of LR4 was that it would tend to hang with a catalog in the 1GB range. I should be happy about this, since I think 1GB is sufficient, and it should clear up as I come back to edit. I'm not - I want more. I used to get fanatic about file size in photographs, as you can imagine. With the advent of affordable digital cameras, we've been shooting more and more, and 1 GB no longer is the crux of the situation. The argument used to be that because you couldn't send a 1 GB file around the world, and it would take forever to download (because of the nature of 802.11), it's not worth chipping off 1.1 GB for your concerns. And, theoretically, that's a valid point, but today, I'm less concerned with whether I can or cannot send a file around the world than I am with its longevity. (I think there are more truly fabulous windows photos on Flickr than shots taken at the very last moment of a vacation - they scroll much better, by the way - but I digress...)
