The biggest thing that I noticed about the editing experience is that it's astonishingly fast. In fact, it's sometimes faster than I am used to. I am a novice film editor doing basic color correction and visual effects. To edit in Premiere Pro, for instance, I have to slow my pace to keep up with it. Here, I can clearly see how much faster it's doing things. Where it would take me 15 minutes to edit, it took about five minutes. Where it used to transcode at a snail's pace, it now does it in about 15 minutes with high quality. I do a lot of direct conversion from Final Cut Pro and Premiere to Samsung Level10 HD. As a result, I am accustomed to my system taking advantage of Timecode, giving me the option to choose which audio track I want to convert and adding extra audio effects. I'm not a pro so I don't use all of the abilities of the program. Developers can also use desktop apps on the iPad, and that's what I did more often than using any native iPad app. My MacBook Pro is in the bed next to my desk and, despite a recent GPU upgrade, it's still far faster than the iPad. This is most noticeable when doing color correction for video. My desktop version of premiere features an embedded browser and I now use Photoshop on the iPad, Lightroom on the MacBook, and finally Premiere Pro on the desktop. From Android Studio to Adobe Dreamweaver, I've been using a lot of desktop apps on the iPad recently. These tips show the best way to make the best-possible adjustments to a photo, and keep its text straight. Most importantly, notice that we are choosing to work on the bare photo itself, without any layers. That's an efficient way to work on an image. Layer masks, adjustment layers, gaussian blur, etc. essentially mask your adjustment as you can always nuke everything before editing excepting the actual adjustments themselves.

For example, a group of users working on a design for a team presentation can document the project with minimal effort, and all members can view and comment on the changes. To share the project, all users need to download the project file from the web, and at least one person needs to be online to enable one or more sharing permissions. Users can then review changes and comment in real time. To leave the project at any time, users will need to choose to leave the conversation, and the project is automatically closed. Collaborative projects will be available worldwide, with support for multiple platforms including Mac, iPad and Apple Pencil.
