I've been using it consistently for 2½ years now, since early on in 2013. Thanks to a Creative Cloud membership, I always have the latest release available. I've even downloaded the latest CC 2015 beta and used features that don't even have final release dates. Rather than simply going with the latest version, I recommend using the CC 2015 beta - it's always in beta, and it always has feedback. So far, Elliott Frazer, who is Adobe's lead creative director for Photoshop, has been the most accessible. It's impressive how quickly he's responded. I've even had exposure to his videography skills on YouTube, and I've also appreciated how personal and candid he is while still maintaining respect for the customer. I'm hoping that he'll add support for X-Trans sensors before they even launch. Not only does it make sense as a matter of customer service, but it would be the right thing to do. The latest version of Lightroom - the very popular RAW conversion app for Adobe's Creative Cloud subscription - just got a major update to address a few serious bugs and issues. This software update is part of the Lightroom 5.2 release, which is now available. Why is this update so important? For one, it's reassuring to see that the app continues to receive updates. One of the first, and perhaps the easiest of these updates, is a fix for the "Screen brightness in dark room" issue. This bug was affecting many darkroom users. If you were one of those users, your nightmare is over: You can safely use Lightroom 5 on the PC. The fix is easy: Just choose a new screen brightness setting from the "Auto" option.
