In September last year, Mr Duncan Smith, who was then a minister in the Department for Work and Pensions, wrote to the Queen, asking for an investigation into “corruption” in the social security system. In response, and apparently in the belief that an open letter to the Queen was not a legally enforceable document, an employment tribunal in London dismissed Mr Duncan Smith’s complaint. Instead, the tribunal ruled that because Mr Duncan Smith had written to the Queen himself, this made it a letter and therefore a private matter. A further appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal in Birmingham then failed, as did a subsequent appeal to the Court of Appeal. Mr Duncan Smith’s lawyer, Andrew Jupp, said that the DWP’s argument that the Queen’s signature on a letter was sufficient to make it a private letter meant that “at least 30 million letters” would fall within this category, which is “absurd”.
