White-tailed deer (Odocoileus virginianus) population declines in urban areas are well documented, but the factors leading to these declines are controversial and complex. In this study, the influence of an urban environment on life history of white-tailed deer was investigated in two different habitats: (a) an urban woodland area with scattered habitat, and (b) an area of grassland bordering an urban woodland. Although deer in the urban woodland habitat grazed throughout the sampling year, deer in the open area had a more restricted range than in the woodland habitat and showed evidence of avoidance of the urban areas. De-pouched fawns born in the woodland showed lower survival than those born in the open area. However, deer born in the woodland showed a higher survival than was expected, given that deer in the woodlands spent more time in this habitat than did deer in the open area. The lower survival in the open area was not supported by fecal corticosterone metabolite levels, which showed no differences between habitat types. Peak population density in the woodland habitat was higher than in the open area. However, at the end of the year, deer in the open area were more than twice as common as deer in the woodland, and calf survival in the woodlands was lower than expected. Male birth rates showed some small effects of habitat type, but males were less influenced by habitat type than were female births
