For photography and video production, you may not want to use the 'managed' render method, which is recommended for more professional work. You can choose either Unicode or Far East (WTF) encoding, and you can pick a resolution that is specific to the TIFF or JPEG format. When saving the project, you can either let Lightroom save the file to disk or use the Print and Email options to send the file to Adobe for rendering. When you are done with your project, you can scan your project file in either sheet format or book length page format, which is then created with the 3D function on the Page menu. The saving of your completed project to a new file is straightforward, and you can print it in booklet format, too. There is also the ability to send your book file to Adobe for conversion. The Print dialog box allows you to choose the output format. Adobe has gone in for a lot more than just color adjustments with 4K HDR output. The Preview panel contains some amazing controls. You can taper the brightness and contrast, adjust the scene-referred colors, tone map the image, add a grayscale conversion, fix blown highlights, and deconstruct, repair, remove noise and spot defects. HDR tone maps are automatically applied for unusual exposures. You can tween the Red, Green, and Blue channels on RGB and CMYK images. The image can become a Black & White image by default. Libraries, which allow you to group images for organizational, depend on cloud documents to synchronize the versions of files. Cloud Documents allow you to open and edit versions of images from external cloud storage. By granting access to external cloud folder from your Learning Center, you can also download files from your external cloud storage. This integration with external cloud storage is a huge benefit, especially if you have a bunch of storage devices, as you can now access them all from one location.
