Yesterday, Adobe released its first public releases of Photoshop and Creative Cloud. This new version all but completes the revision of the Creative Suite 5 applications for release. Specifically, this is the first time we are seeing a version of Lightroom that is separate from the Photoshop application. Traditionally, Photoshop has been the foundation of the entire suite but Lightroom was not available until shortly after Photoshop was released. There were also quite a few program issues with Photoshop, particularly with SD compatibility. Finally, Lightroom wasn't able to import gradients natively until version 3.0. Allowing Lightroom to beta test Photoshop's new features was a smart move on Adobe's part. Starting with version 4.0, Lightroom and Photoshop are now integrated into one application. Like the earlier releases, this update may be a little rough around the edges. For starters, the entire creative suite is now included in the cost of the upgrade, and in many cases you'll be asked to purchase specific applications from the pre-installed list if you are new to that application. This is because the Creative Suite adds new updates and certain features to its base software, which often require an upgrade to access those features and to utilize the suite as a whole. For those upgrading from previous versions of the Creative Suite, the upgrade procedure is painless. Upgrading from earlier versions of Photoshop or any other application costs $299, which isn't much in the grand scheme of things. You also retain all of your previous license agreements, not just for the base version you upgrade to. This means that if you are an Adobe Authorized Reseller, you can continue selling the current version, in effect allowing you to upgrade a maximum of 2 times per year. If you are a Creative Cloud member, you can upgrade as often as you want.

With the development of the Internet, it has created a new way of sharing and viewing images, which is convenient to everyone. However, it has also added a few problems. Although sharing images via the Internet has made it easy to share, a lot of time and energy is required. During the editing stage of an image, it takes a lot of time to do the background work to make an image ready to share with others. e3d0a04c9c
