While the interface is cluttered, there is much to be said for its application. The navigation with shortcuts is more intuitive than it ever was. The whole logic behind the use of the keyboard is much more apparent. The most obvious change from the previous version is, of course, the new Camera Raw (and Lightroom) with Lightroom 5 is a small application with many of the same functions as Photoshop. The application must have been designed in a hurry to meet a specific deadline. Why produce a front end at all? Why not integrate the functions into the application's panels? What's worse,

Lightroom 5 leaves out importing pictures from your computer or from most of your other applications. It also looks amateurish when a computer is selected instead of an image. Very little has been done to update Lightroom to work effectively with the latest versions of other Adobe products (whether Lightroom is the central tool or one of the tools). If you are a Lightroom user upgrading to Lightroom 5 will be a long, drawn out process of learning with no assurance that it will work properly. New features like Panorama, Lucida Grande, Lens Blur, Three-Way Shadow Control, and others are scattered through the menus and interface, making them very hard to find. Yet, Photoshop is still considered one of the best image editing programs around. With this version of Lightroom, many of the features missed in the previous versions continue to be addressed and on-boarded.
